SUBSTITUTES FOR COAL.

The Philadelphia Press discusses the subject of economy in coal, and directs attention to an invention which has just been brought out in that State by which benzine can be safely and economically burned in a stove. It is also said that a company is now forming in London for the purpose of working the Scotch peat fields, with a view to make them of more than local importance. By a process which has been tested, this peat can be converted into a condensed pulp, which is almost equal to wood in solidity when dry. This is said to be superior to coal for most purposes. While it is fully equal in its heat generating power, it is free from the bad odors and smoke arising from coal. The individual or the company who shall establish the possibility of making this condensed peat an article of commorce, to compete with other fuel where it is not native, will deserve the thanks of mankind.

Whether the predictions in relation to the failure of the coal supply have actually stimulated invention, or merely brought to light inventions that were already secretly in existence, certain it is that economical appliances are now more rapidly multiplying than ever before. The day of stoves that are to save more fuel than the old ones burned, if we may believe the enthusiastic advertisements, seems to be past, and to have given place to means more strictly confined to utilizing the waste parts of the fuel. Of this character is a process which has been successfully experimented upon in England, by which coal dust can be burned. There is about all coal mines a large quantity of refuse dust which has been entirely unseless; in many places it is a nuisances difficult to be disposed of, and many attempts have been made to convert it to some use. It has been mixed with peat or clay in some instances, and used for tuel in dried cakes or bricks; but all such processes have proved too expensive. If this English invention shall be successful, therefore, it will be a great benefit to the world. The first part of this process is the reduction of all the waste dust to powder. One account thus describes the machinery for this purpose: "There is a pair of common millstones, the whole cost of grinding and screening being twenty five cents a ton. The dust which passes through a sieve of nine hundred meshes to the inch is found to be most effective. From the sieve the fuel is conducted by an Archimedean screw to the feeding apparatus, which is a ing stirrers, which keep the whole contents of dust in general agitation. These stirrers for dust in general agitation. These stirrers furnish a continuous and unvarying supply of fuel to an annular tube leaping into the furnace, and at a point where it is taken by the current of atmospheric air. The furnace is started by lighting a fire in the combustion chamber with kindling wood, and when a sufficient degree of heat has been developed, the air and coal dust are admitted."

A furnace for the trial of this fuel has been in operation at the Woolwich Arsenal in England, and it is said not only to be a success as far as the entire consumption of the dust is concerned, but that it accomplishes this without smoke. Furthermore, it has been found very useful in the manufacture of malleable iron and steel, or the process known as mechanical puddling. If all that is claimed for this invention is true, its introduction will establish an era in manufacturing economy and comfort, and the day of short fuel may be postponed some centuries beyond the limits set by the prophets. - Balt. EFFECTS OF THE PANIC.

As severely as the present stringency in money matters effects merchants and the public generally, it nevertheless, in many instances, bears good results, as one of the latter may be cited that we can now offer to the public a large, fine and well selected stock of HATS, comprising all the latest styles, at greatly reduced prices. Having bought them in New York at a forced sale at panic prices for cash, we unhesitatingly assert that we can sell them at fifty per cent less than regular retail prices.
